

Failure to integrate gender equality is costing African economies billions of dollars

If Africa is to achieve the sustainable development goals, it needs to prioritise women's access to finance, said Economic Commission for Africa's (ECA) deputy executive secretary Giovanie Bih, speaking at an African Women Leadership Fund (AWLF) event in Marrakesh, Morocco, ahead of the fifth Africa Regional Forum on Sustainable Development (ARFSD).

Image source: United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (ECA)

Biha said adopting the right actions to integrate gender in Africa's economies will result in financial inclusion, guarantee women's economic empowerment and achievement of the SDGs, thereby helping change the face of the continent.

According to the ECA's Women's Report (2013), failure to integrate gender equality and women's empowerment into national economies has cost African countries a combined $95bn in lost productivity annually.

"This is an indicator that financial exclusion of women is not an option for our continent," said Biha, adding the African Women Leadership Fund was an impact fund that aims to strengthen economic empowerment of women and accelerate the emergence of African women fund managers who in turn will invest in and develop African women-led businesses and micro-businesses.

Over the next decade the fund is envisaged to have made an investment of up to $500m in African-owned and women-led companies.

The fund is anchored on six pillars:

- Providing African women entrepreneurs access to sustainable capital,
- Providing African cooperatives access to sustainable capital,
- Lowering barriers to entry for capable women asset managers focused on investing in women-owned and women-led companies,
- Providing technical assistance to accelerate the fund management learning curve and supporting growth and expansion,
- Providing seed capital to develop a track record and accelerate fundraising and scale, and
- Focus on sustainability and scalability of the platform.

The ECA is supporting the operationalisation of the fund, a brainchild of the United Nations deputy secretary general Amina J. Mohammed, African Union Commission chairperson Moussa Faki Mahamat and the AWLN.

Speakers praised the formation of the fund saying it will address the fundamental gap in the access of women to finance architecture.

Djibouti's women and family affairs minister Moumina Houmed said the story of women and finance was similar to that of every other African country. She shared efforts being undertaken by her country, including capacity building of associations and cooperatives; partnerships with the private sector to train women entrepreneurs and getting banks to give women more access to finance.

"We know that even in family-owned businesses women have a much lower share. We have very few women entrepreneurs on the continent because of the hurdle of access to finance. As such, the fund seeks to lower these hurdles faced by women-owned businesses, promote investments in micro enterprises and take women's cooperatives to the next level," said Nabila Freidji, a Moroccan entrepreneur and member of the AWLF committee.

Financial inclusion a must

Thoko Ruzvidzo, ECA's Gender, Poverty and Social Policy Division director, spoke about the AWLF and what it is expected to achieve. "Failure is not an option," she said, adding women's financial inclusion in African economies was a must.

She said funds will be earmarked for each of the five regions of North Africa, East Africa, Central Africa, West Africa, and Southern Africa with a strategy being established for each region to address unique elements of the markets, or to reflect priorities for each region.

Priority would be given to women-led businesses. At least 65% of capital will be invested in women-led companies.

Leila Rhiwi, a representative of UN Women in Morocco, emphasised the importance of women accessing finance to bolster their businesses saying they have already proven themselves as entrepreneurs and drivers of the economy.

The high-level meeting was attended by representatives of the Moroccan business and financial ecosystem, government officials, senior women executives and young women entrepreneurs, among others.