

5 tips for budding radio presenters

April is always an exciting time in the local radio space. Contract renewal season often means that stations announce their new lineups - and it's a time where new talent is often introduced to audiences. It's no secret that getting into the radio industry isn't an easy feat.

Source: www.pexels.com

With only a handful of stations and slots available, the race to grab one of the few vacant spots is a difficult one. However, for many, being on radio is a dream.

Jacaranda FM's Martin Bester shares some insight into what budding presenters should do to stand out, hone their skills and grab their radio dreams by the horns.

1. Know your industry

It is so important to know the ins and the outs of the industry you are wanting to pursue. If you are auditioning to be a part of a radio station's lineup, do your research and familiarise yourself with the station, their talent, and what the station stands for.

In a world where social media opens you up to a lot more information, use that to your advantage. Research trends about radio, see what brands are doing and the direction they are taking within the industry, and adapt that into the talent that you bring.

The volatile 'South African radio lineup change' culture

Chris Jordan 4 Apr 2022

2. Create, create, create!

I often get asked what is the fastest way for upcoming talent to get their start on radio – and the answer is, you need to put in the work. There is no such thing as overnight success.

Have you been on a campus, community, or even school station? Do you have a podcast that programming or station managers can listen to? Use what is available for free.

Back in the day, you had to book a studio, record a demo and get a producer to cut the demo before sending it out to radio stations. These days, all you need is data and a phone. Don't be afraid to start small. It doesn't matter if you have an audience of one or one million, if you hone in your craft, you'll go far. Just create!

3. Be fearless and command attention

Always put up your hand and showcase yourself. Success doesn't come overnight and if you're not afraid to chase your dreams by putting in the work, chances are you'll go far. I made sure I could not be ignored when I was doing the early morning shows, the 1-5am show, and the lunchtime show during my early days on radio.

It's important to make yourself visible and be seen and heard so that people take note of you.

2022 Radio Awards entries open

18 Mar 2022

4. Don't be afraid to break the right rules

Sometimes what you need to do is break the rules to stand out. Always try to be a step ahead. Make sure you keep an eye on international trends, be abreast of local conversations, and never be afraid to take risks in order for you to stand out. Skills can be learnt. Attitude, willingness and eagerness to succeed and do your best is what sets you apart from the rest.

5. Learn from those who inspire you

When looking to get into a career in radio, you need to figure out what kind of presenter you want to be. Do your research and familiarise yourself with the stations and the talent that inspire you.

One of the biggest things that I learnt was always be a fan of someone – especially if you are going to ask them for advice. When you're a fan of someone, you admire what they do and how they do it. Follow your radio idols on social media so that you are aware of what they are doing and how they making waves in the space. Through that, you can learn and perfect your skills from experts in the industry.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>