

The R500m KfW donation that spotlights Joe Phaahla

The German Development Bank (KfW) has donated multimillion-rand mobile health clinics to South Africa - the generosity of which was met with deep gratitude by Health Minister Joe Phaahla in Pietermaritzburg, KwaZulu Natal last week.

Source: Pexels

The minister said the donation supports efforts by the South African government to strengthen the public health system.

“Today is one of the most exciting days for the National Department of Health and the provincial departments as we formally acknowledge the support we received from the German government, through the German Development Bank and the DG Murray Trust.

“The governments of Germany and South Africa have enjoyed a very fruitful relationship across several departments for a while now,” he said.

Phaahla was speaking at the official hand over of the equipment at the Town Hill Hospital.

The Minister was joined by the German Ambassador to South Africa, Andreas Peschke, deputy health minister Sibongiseni Dhlomo, KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Health, Nomagugu Simelane, leaders from local government and DG Murray Trust.

The donated assets, valued at R500m, include specialised vaccine fridges, vaccine carriers, temperature monitoring devices, notebooks, tablets and mobile health clinics.

Phaahla said the 46 mobile clinics have contributed to changing people's lives and that they have reached 1.9 million individuals with direct interpersonal interactions.

"I will work with the MECs to sustain and maintain these assets when the funding ends in September this year."

Phaahla said the mobile units operate in four provinces including Gauteng, Eastern Cape and KwaZulu-Natal, and are operated by professional nurses, communicators and local mobilisers supported by the #KeReady youthful doctors.

BioNTech ready to ship first mRNA vaccine factory kit to Africa

22 Dec 2022

"These units are serving as the bedrock of our campaign to get closer to the youth community and highlight the challenges that face youth life," said the minister.

"We consider the ambassador and his team as friends; friends who did not abandon us at the height of the Covid-19 pandemic, but stayed with us and provided support for specific vulnerable communities in the informal settlements.

"We thank you for the precise, strategic and tailored programmes you brought into our primary healthcare ecosystem," he said.

He told the attendees that today's gathering was not just a celebration but an occasion to showcase the countries' bilateral relationship and to demonstrate that their relationship was beneficial to both nations.

"Our vision and objectives for the health sector have been expressed in many documents and on many other platforms."

Striving for Universal Health Access

The Universal Health Access through the National Health Insurance (NHI), he said, was a vision South Africa strives towards, working with the private sector.

"We are committed to this vision and the outcomes we envisage despite the huge setback due to the Covid-19 pandemic."

Green light for Cape Health Technology Park

28 Feb 2023

He noted German's specific targeted programmes, which are evidence-based and believes that will have an impact.

The focus includes children who are reached through the Early Childhood Development (ECD) programme, young people in hard-to-reach areas, community-led social mobilisation campaigns, strong monitoring and evaluation systems and cost-effective approaches.

"Ambassador, we recognise that you give our people a hand to uplift them out of poverty, instead of once-off hand-outs which are not sustainable," said Phaahla.

He acknowledged the German government for its support during the Covid-19 response.

Phaahla expressed his gratitude for German's forward-thinking approach, which he described as "precise and impactful".

"We will scale it up as we move forward and apply lessons learned to our programmes."

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>