

Brands can, and should, ensure that their ads don't appear on fake news sites

By Neil Pursey

26 Oct 2018

A recent investigation by News24 revealed that many of South Africa's biggest brands were inadvertently funding fake news sites. In the article, many of the brands implicated (or their agency representatives) plead ignorance, claiming that they have little control over where their ads end up.

© georgejmlittle via Unsplash.com

In truth, however, brands have much greater control over their online advertising than they imagine. Moreover, they have a duty to exercise that control and ensure they don't end up funding fake news.

Doing so not only means playing a role in protecting the credibility of news information, but it also means that brands can better protect themselves in a world where reputation matters more than ever.

Understanding fake news

Before we dig into why brands need to pay more attention to where their online ads appear, it's important to understand what fake news actually is.

Contrary to what some politicians would have you believe, fake news is not news that doesn't align with your political views. Nor, for that matter, is it a news story that later turns out to be discredited because a journalist was misled by a source.

Instead, fake news refers to made up articles that are provably false and have popular appeal. Today, these articles largely appear on websites designed to mimic credible news sites.

Like mainstream publications, these sites make their money from advertising. Some of them, like the ones run by teenagers in one Macedonian town have made a lot of money.

Programmatic and Google's conundrum

But how are these sites able to attract advertising? After all, it's not like they're going out to brands and promising massive audiences if they advertise on their platforms (the way traditional publishers do).

Instead, they're taking advantage of products like Google AdSense, which allow publishers to serve automatic text, image, video, or interactive ads. For every ad served, the publisher receives around 68% of the revenue, with Google pocketing the rest.

The ads served are based on a combination of the site's content and individuals users' interests. With the content on fake news sites designed for maximum virality (something that's much easier to do when you don't have to worry about the truth), it's easy to see how the money might pile up.

On that basis, it might be tempting to blame Google for ads appearing on these sites. It's certainly an argument that's been made often, but it's really not that simple.

While fake news sites have exploited AdSense (and other automated platforms), Google is constantly fighting to keep them off the platform. Every quarter, it kicks hundreds of so-called "bad publishers" off AdSense.

But with new sites cropping up quicker than they can be quashed, there's only so much Google can do.

Brand safety

This is where the brands themselves come in. Someone in the brand team needs to be reviewing ad placements. This can be done internally, or via the outsourced agency the brand uses.

And if your agency tells you that's impossible, it's time to change agencies. A simple place to start is to have a list of fake news websites you want to exclude your ads from. Update this list regularly and, if a customer informs you that your ad is appearing on a site that's not on your list, investigate it.

Reporting these sites to Google will also help in the overall war against fake news.

Protecting integrity

Brands need to protect their integrity. That's always been true, but in an age where consumers are hyper-conscious of what they do and don't want to be associated with, it's vital. But brand integrity doesn't just mean appearing in the right places, it also means having a conscience when it comes to important global issues.

The fake news industry is driven by money. Brands can, and should, play their part in ensuring that revenue dries up.

ABOUT NEIL PURSEY

I founded Measurebyte in 2020 with a mission to improve centralised marketing reporting to eliminate inherent biases. The result of this is improved marketing operations, which is helping our clients save on media wastage and improve their ability to measure their impact on sales.

- Here's what your marketing leadership should be focused on - 28 Feb 2022
- Brand safety: It's about more than fake news - 22 Nov 2018
- Brands can, and should, ensure that their ads don't appear on fake news sites - 26 Oct 2018

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>