

The importance of crisis communication

By Dan Mbyane

14 Jul 2020

Covid-19 is a global health crisis that has highlighted the need for clear and regular communication by all types of organisations, including business. The pandemic has highlighted the importance of communication on a global scale. It has become imperative that organisations must be factual and concise when communicating their messages. Communication has become of paramount importance.

Image source: 123RF.com

Although communication is at the heart of everyday life; it is a skill that requires appropriate knowledge and technique. Covid-19 has impacted countries and their economies in an unprecedented manner. The pandemic has made it hard for businesses to operate and the need for suitable and regular communication with employees, clients, customers, suppliers, regulators, and other stakeholders has increased tremendously.

We have reached a point where it is essential for South African businesses to have crisis communication plans in place. A plan gives a business the best chance of communicating the intended messages and ensuring that the messages reach the target audience. The Covid-19 pandemic has literally redefined crisis communication, not only is it about the business image but it has now also become a way of educating the public about the pandemic.

Lessons from Covid-19 - Be crisis ready!

Victor Mberiane, APR 27 Mar 2020

Every business will go through a crisis at one point or the other. A crisis comes with uncertainties, especially one that is beyond one's control, but business can still plan and set out objectives that will ensure effective brand communication. Covid-19 has made businesses aware that the least likely situations are possible and that it is better to have planned for them, rather than getting a surprise and panicking.

Could small businesses have planned better?

Theoretically, with the benefit of hindsight, the world, governments and their countries, and the various sectors of society could have planned for a pandemic. Yes, it is an expensive exercise that takes longer to put into practice, but we could have planned for it. Any company that is in existence and has leadership in place needs to realise that we need to plan for a crisis. We could plan for the worst-case scenarios, but only a few could have planned for the Covid-19 pandemic.

If you think about what has become vital; the need for effective communication from leaders has been emphasized at every stage. Some leaders have done exceptionally well across the sectors of society while others have stumbled as they try to make sense of the devastating global pandemic as it is overwhelming.

For example, the South African Health Minister, Dr Zweli Mkhize, was praised at the beginning for championing government communication efforts in the fight against the novel coronavirus.

“ Covid-19 has underlined the fact that organisations need to develop their crisis communication plans. A good crisis communication plan puts a business in an excellent position for successful disaster recovery. A robust business continuity plan must include crisis communication as a key component of crisis management. ”

Important communication factors to look out for during a crisis

There are a few points that we must be aware of which will set you apart as a leader from a communication perspective:

- Being timeous in your response – communicate with your stakeholders as often as you can.
- Clear messages – clarity is important in what you are saying to stakeholders, people want to know how to navigate out of the crisis and not panic.
- Accurate information – educate yourself about what you are dealing with to counter fake news, speculation, and rumours.
- Have empathy – check in with people who are of your organisation. Be they employees, suppliers, and clients. Be visible.
- Be ready to be of service – find out what they need, be honest about where you can help and express sympathy when necessary.

Can we assume that there will be another pandemic in future such as Covid-19 or worse? We may never know. What we do know is that it is not a case of “if” your company will experience a crisis, it is “when”. What we might not know is what kind of a crisis we might experience, but we can always plan for it before it happens. Therefore, this demonstrates that every organisation – big or small - needs an effective and active crisis communication plan in place for today and tomorrow, to ensure that it will survive and recover from a disaster.

Communications in a time of crisis

Sandra Gordon 18 Mar 2020

Having a crisis communication strategy has become a need and the Covid-19 pandemic has only reinforced the need. As the saying goes “if you don’t plan, then you plan to fail”, this goes for communication as well. It is never a good idea to communicate as situations arise. Businesses need to look at their nature and try to predict worst-case scenarios and have active communication plans put in place to ensure that they leave nothing unsaid and cover all likely disastrous events. When a crisis strikes, with a plan on hand it becomes a straightforward case of focusing on the appropriate messages depending on the nature of the disaster emergency. Stay safe, resilient, and strong.

ABOUT DAN MOYANE

My 4 decades of media and communication experience have aided me to offer in-depth training through AceCube PR to spokespeople, company executives and senior managers so that they are able to recognise and optimise opportunities for digital media interaction.

- Navigating complexities as communicators - 29 Nov 2022
- The importance of crisis communication - 14 Jul 2020
- Looking and sounding good on digital channels is essential - 23 Jun 2020

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>